Katie's neighborhood had the feeling of closenes that might exist in a small settlement. It seemed almost to have its own goverment, with a homeowners' association group and a neighborhood crime watch. Katie decided to join the neighborhood community and start a babysitting club. She found it to be a nearly effortless job to sign up babysitters who wanted to be in the club. Everybody understood that there would be no forgivness for tardyness on the job—and that nobody could be forgettful. One rainy morning, Katie made flyers to advertise the babysitting club. As soon as she had finished, the rain stopped, and the sun erased all traces of cloudines. She then took enjoiment in distributing the flyers to the plentiful supply of prospective neighborhood clients!
